US states ask Google to reveal its advertising business model

Attorneys general are asking Google to turn over information about its ad-tech buys, data collection and revenue

DAVID MCLAUGHLIN, GERRIT DE VYNCK & NAOMI NIX
Washington, September 11

STATE ATTORNEYS GENERAL investigating Google are ordering it to turn over a wide range of information about its advertising business, according to an investigative demand that takes direct aim at the biggest source of the company's revenue.

Texas Attorney General Ken Paxton's office, which is leading the nationwide probe, on Monday issued a 29-page civil investigative demand obtained by Bloomberg. In more than 200 directives, investigators ordered the company to produce detailed explanations and documents by October 9 related to its sprawling system of online advertising products.

The September 9 investigative demand, which is similar to a subpoena, was issued as 48 states, the District of Columbia and Puerto Rico announced an antitrust investigation of Google from the steps of the US Supreme Court in Washington. The attorneys general said they were looking at Google's advertising practices, but their detailed demand to the company hasn't been previously reported.

According to the document, the states want information about Google's past acquisitions of advertising technology companies, including DoubleClick and AdMob; its top advertisers and publishers; data collection practices; pricing models; and the functions of the ad auction market that delivers ads across the internet.

The document's questions dig deep into the "black box" of Google's money-making machine and ask for a thorough explanation of how it all works. Even to experts, the ad tech

'MONEY-MAKING MACHINE'

■ The process of showing an ad to a single person visiting a web page can involve dozens of companies and multiple auctions and transactions

■ Questions asked dig deep into the "black box" of Google's money-making machine

■ Google controls about 37% of digital ad spending in the US, ahead of No. 2 Facebook at 22%, according to EMarketer

■ Alphabet reported $116.3 bn in ad revenue last year — 85% of its overall sales market can seem opaque and dizzying in its complexity.

The process of showing an ad to a single person visiting a web page can involve dozens of companies and multiple auctions and transactions. Google has worked its way into controlling much of that process, and investigators want to know exactly how powerful the company has become in this space.

Johnson loses in court on Parliament suspension, increasing confusion

ALASTAIR REED & JONATHAN BROWNING
Edinburgh, September 11

Lord Carloway, Scotland's most senior judge rules that British PM's decision to suspend Parliament is unlawful in this image taken from video on Wednesday

PRIME MINISTER BORIS Johnson lost a Scottish court ruling on the suspension of Parliament, throwing the deadlocked British political system into even greater confusion ahead of the October 31 Brexit date.

The court, in a short ruling, said that the purpose of the Prime Minister's move was to unlawfully "stymie" Parliament. The unanimous decision Wednesday by a panel of Edinburgh appeal judges will set up a showdown in the UK Supreme Court, which will take up the issue next week.

"My message to Boris Johnson is you are playing fast and loose with the law," Ian Blackford, a Scottish member of Parliament, said in a tweet. "You have acted in an anti-democratic manner and need to respond by recalling Parliament."

While Johnson had suffered several political defeats in Parliament, until now he had fared better in court with victories in London and at a lower court in Edinburgh.

The threat of prorogation galvanized Labour politicians and a group of Conservative rebels into passing a bill requiring the prime minister to push back the date when the UK leaves the European Union if he can't get a deal in Brussels.

A group of more than 70 lawmakers had argued that the prime minister's move — which took effect Monday night — was unconstitutional because it curtailed debate in the run-up to the deadline for Britain's exit from the EU.

"I have never been able to contemplate the possibility that the law could be that our sovereign Parliament might be treated as an inconvenience by the Prime Minister," Jolyon Maughan, the attorney spearheading the Scottish case, said after the ruling.
